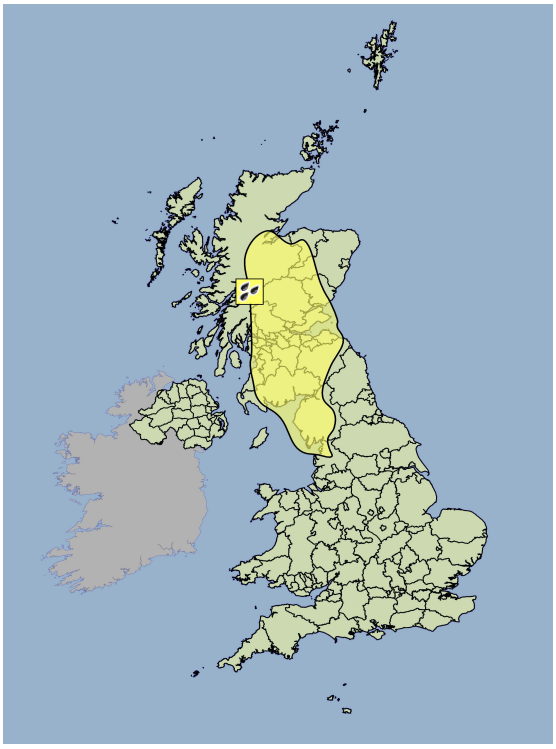
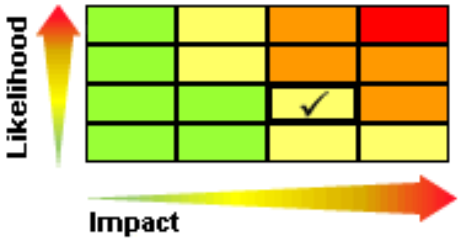
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A frontal system will to run into the UK from the west on Wednesday, bringing further rainfall and strong winds. This will then sink southeastwards across the UK, clearing through Scotland by around midnight Thursday and clearing northern England early on Thursday.

Further heavy rainfall looks likely across pars of Scotland and northwest England. 20-40 mm of rain is expected widely across high ground and there is a low likelihood of locally seeing 60-80 mm over the highest ground of these areas. Renewed flooding is possible given the saturated ground and volume of water running through the river network.

Rainfall totals and further flooding of the level seen over the weekend are not expected.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 11:00 on Wed, 09th Dec 2015 until 03:00 on Thu, 10th Dec 2015

Further rainfall is expected to arrive across much of Scotland and northern England during Wednesday afternoon and evening. The rain will become persistent and heavy at times, mainly over high ground, before clearing to the southeast overnight Wednesday and into early Thursday.

Some very strong winds are also likely in association with this system for which a separate warning has been issued. This could prove a further hazard.

Be aware of the potential for further disruption from flooding and to transport. This warning has been updated to extend it over a larger area of southern Scotland where surface water could cause localised disruption on the roads during Wednesday evening's rush hour.
